I was just seven years old when I looked out a window of our flat. I saw a new car parked on the street. It belonged to the Tans next door. I asked my mother innocently why we did not own a car.

Mother smiled and said, "We have you, your sister and this house. I think it is enough."

I kept quiet and stared at the Tans as they climbed into their shiny new car with a twinge of jealousy. I was too young to understand the financial struggles Mother and Father faced. All I could do was hope that one day we would be able to own one.

Years passed and we commuted everywhere together by bus, train and taxi. I enjoyed taking the bus the most. I loved peering through the large windows, feeling the wind blow on my face and watching all those pedestrians, shopping malls and houses rush past outside.

As the government upgraded the public transport system and built better roads, public transport had since become a lot easier. Those who owned cars now preferred to use public transport because it was safe and cheap. Even Mr. Tan next door was taking the train to work.

One evening, as I was standing at the window looking at all the parked cars, Mother came up beside me. "Your sister is planning to get a car," she said. Suddenly, owning a car did not seem to matter so much. The journey of love we had taken together as a family had bonded us tightly over the years.

Remembering our conversation twenty years earlier, I turned to her and said, "Mother, we have one another and this house. I think it is enough."

- (1) They found it safe and inexpensive.
  - (2) They enjoyed the wind blowing on their faces.
  - (3) They preferred commuting with everyone else.
  - (4) They loved watching houses and pedestrians rush past them.
24. ~~Who~~ <sup>What does</sup> "one another" in the passage refer to?
- (1) It refers to the writer and his mother.
  - (2) It refers to the writer's <sup>and his</sup> family members.
  - (3) It refers to the writer and the Tan family.
  - (4) It refers to the commuters of public transport.
